Participants will learn to differentiate instruction for African American Students by:

- Using excellent instructional strategies, interactions, and content which work especially well with students who have not experienced academic success.
- Becoming familiar and recognizing varieties of African American language constructions and meanings, and their implications to teaching and learning.
- Addressing academic needs and strengths of students in regular education classrooms and in special education classrooms.
- Planning to work with the school community to create an equitable and anti-racist school environment to acquire excellence.
- Teaching partnership strategies to involve families of students in their children's education.

About the presenter:

Enid Lee began her career as a classroom teacher 35 years ago. Today she is an accomplished "front line teacher," teacher educator, researcher, writer, consultant, facilitator and speaker. She has taught in the Caribbean, Canada and the USA and has been involved in the professional development of teachers for two decades. She consults internationally on anti-racist, inclusionary and equitable education.

She has pioneered the equity-centered initiative, Putting Race On The Table, which is designed to help teachers and administrators develop the skills, knowledge and will to create and maintain equity-centered classrooms.

Enid Lee is the author of over 30 publications. They include "Letters to Marcia: A teacher's guide to Anti-racist education," the docudramas, "Quick to Judge" and "Food for Thought" from the television series, "Many Voices," and "Beyond Heroes and Holidays: A Practical Guides to K-12 Anti-Racist, Multicultural Education and Staff Development." Her current area of research is professional development and anti-racist school leadership.
